We agree. Ryan's problem is that he mistakes his tactical skill, which I'm sure is considerable, for any strategic, much less philosophical, understanding. Then he becomes offended that I would dare to challenge him. The anger on his side is very personal, as his tweets reveal.

Naloxone reverses overdose but is NOT substance abuse treatment. Parents who misuse opioids need SA treatment so that they can properly care for their children. An overdose reversal can be the first step to recovery if detox and treatment are offered and accepted.

A textbook case of why low-level cannabis dealing produces so much violence. This happened in Washington - a legal state.

The only difference here: the witness survived to tell the cops what he'd seen (and the cops put it in the charging documents).

For the nth time: the pharmacological effects of drugs are (largely) unaffected by their legal status. Marijuana causes paranoia whether it's legal or not; cocaine and heroin are illegal because they're dangerous - not the other way around, despite what legalizers pretend.

When "harm reducers" and legalizers make comments like this, framing addiction as just another life choice, I cringe. Especially in the context of parenting. The abuser may find his "life with addiction" inherently meaningful. His kids are likely to find it chaotic and dangerous.

The black market has not been reduced what are the reasons? Could it be the banning of stores in many towns, the too high prices. Still we see the top cities for murder rates are not in the legal states except for E. St. Louis and Detroit. There should be repeal ballot measures.

The current leader of the GOP continually demands personal loyalty to him, and goes after GOPers who break with or criticize him. The days of Republicans being rugged individualists are long gone.

21 million slaves? We obviously can't stop modern slavery. It's time to end the failed War on Slavery and instead to commit to slavery harm reduction - with supervised sites where slaves can work. I look forward to seeing what the Slavery Policy Alliance has to say!

Slavery Today

There are an estimated 21 million to 45 million people trapped in some form of slavery today. It's sometimes called "Modern-Day Slavery" and sometimes "Human Trafficking." At all times it is slavery at its core.

What is the definition of human trafficking?
The United Nations defines human trafficking as the recruitment, transportation, transfer, harboring, or receipt of persons by improper means (such as force, abduction, fraud, or coercion) for an improper purpose including forced labor or sexual exploitation. It takes on many forms today. Explore them below.

Biden +20 in Virginia. A lot of Democrats who were alive when the Berlin Wall fell - real Democrats, not socialists - were terrified over Bernie and his #BernieBros, terrified at the way the race was breaking. Now they have a real path out. Watch what happens...

Nate Silver @NateSilver538
So this is the first fully post-South Carolina poll we've seen in a Super Tuesday state, from a pollster that generally has low numbers for Biden and, ummm, it has Biden +20 in Virginia, a state where the polls were ~tied before SC.

And it turns out cultural splits are easier to paper over than age-related/ideological ones, so Trump will have the advantage in November despite his smaller base (no matter the Democratic nominee).

Not saying he will necessarily win, but he won't be coping with a split party.

Joe Biden is mopping the floor in states that he never visited, where he opened zero field offices, and where he spent next to nothing on TV.

Tonight is yet another reminder that support for cannabis legalization is a mile wide and an inch deep - even among Democrats. (And that older black voters in particular are deeply suspicious of it.) Between Biden and Trump, legalization is going nowhere fast...

It's up to your state. Several states have legalized cannabis. This is an issue that belongs on your state ballot.

Americans - most Democrats and centrists, anyway - are sick of anger real and manufactured. Of being preached to and at. Of being told the country stinks, the world is ending. Of cancel culture. Of pseudo-fascism from both sides. And tonight they proved it.

1/ Two more takeaways from #SuperTuesday: #Bernie is truly done. He has no viable path - not in terms of the map, but in terms of his message. He says he plans to double down on the attacks on #Biden, but how does that help him with the Democrats who rejected him yesterday?

The left, as ever, seeing conspiracy where none exists (Biden has "no campaign" and is facing a billionaire and a guy who has been running continuously since 2014 but "a few phone calls" fixes everything) and learning the wrong lessons. Corbyn-Sanders in 2024, amirite?

> Nathan J Robinson @NathanJRobinson
> If Biden wins the nomination, it will be a real lesson in how power works. Bernie was on track to win, Biden had no campaign, and they all knew it. So a few phone calls were made behind the scenes to Amy, Pete, Beto. Several million was put into a pro-Warren Super PAC. Voila!

1/ The police are starting to notice the cannabis-violence connection. Some background - this case attracted a lot of local attention for its brutality and apparent randomness; the officer (who asked that both he and the case remain nameless) emailed me...

Primary

I worked extensively on the case. In the case it was only marijuana. Even fter three trials there has never been any substantial "reason" identified for his murder. They were all smoking marijuana and seemingly just decided to violently beat him unconscious, drive him out to a remote pullout, march him into the woods, and execute him. Finding one teenager capable of committing such a crime is difficult. The statistical odds of four of them acting together to commit such a crime is almost impossible, unless you have a single shared factor which influences behavior. From the beginning that factor was identified as marijuana. Obviously just my opinion. It is not the harmless drug everyone makes it out to be. Although for many users I believe it is a relatively harmless drug. Two things can be true at once

2/ I hesitate to talk about these cases because they truly sound like Reefer Madness; but the fact is that I can point to multiple recent incidents of group homicidal violence against one apparently innocent victim where cannabis was the only drug the suspects had used...

3/ Obviously these cases are still extremely rare (thankfully), but they are popping up. I think the drug's dissociative tendencies may be the issue - if one or two people are leading the violence, the others may have an easier time going along.

Interesting how phrase "reefer madness" inhibits speech, derisively used to doubt scientific evidence since 1980's. The India Hemp Commission (1890's) reported that between 25% - 45% of psychotic patients in "Bengal Insane Asylum" were there because of marijuana. No derision.

1/ Verrry interesting poll out of Minnesota: only 51% favor full cannabis legalization there - far below the 65% support legalization was usually getting nationally last year.

MN is a purple-to-blue state - no reason to believe it would be an outlier.

By every modern definition of causation, it has been shown that THC can cause psychosis.

This is a solid response to our study in on cessation. The idea is that Rx decisions could be a reaction to something troubling or unsettling. This same concern also applies to all prior reports correlating dose with overdose risk.

> Jane Liebschutz, MD MPH @liebschutz

Stefan - two questions - do you see any way to account for the potential confounding without individual chart reviews - a massive task? And since the risk of stopping - for whatever reason - soars with time of use, isn't the takeaway once again to minimize use whenever possible?

The THC caps are useful symbolically - they highlight both how strong cannabis has become and the absurdity of cannabis-as-medicine - for what other "medicine" are patients allowed to pick the strength of their prescription?

China's results came from getting the reproduction # < 1.

Perhaps you're aware of the measures they put in place to achieve that.

Our public health system is letting this go. Unless that's changed, we won't see 1 in 18,000 infected like they have. We'll see 1 in 20, or 1 in 2.

This has been flying around Twitter the last 24 hours and I cannot say enough how foolish and wrong it is. It is the stupidest kind of math. The virus doesn't adapt. We do. New cases have fallen by a factor of 30 in China in the last month. You read that right. Not risen. FALLEN.

We're starting to flirt with financial crisis. Companies are highly leveraged. Banks are better capitalized than in '07 but they aren't actually well-capitalized (despite assurances).

Are banks not well-capitalized? Not point-scoring - I really don't know - but my impression is the bigs have huge reserves of cash/equivalents (like 7%+) on their balance sheets?

This is incredible: as of right now 30% of people who took the poll think stocks will be down 20% today. (We will not be down 20%.)

No, Stuart, no. Don't do this. What happens if an asteroid hits the earth? If we have a nuclear war? Zero evidence that this is where we'll be in a month (see China/Korea, see a 0.7% CFR and falling replications), and this panic helps no one. You have 81,000 followers. Be smart.

Yeah, moderate Dems have won the popular vote in only six of the last seven Presidential elections. It's obviously a losing strategy/policy. Remind me how Mondale and McGovern ran? I say again: progressives should be better at losing. They do it enough. @DLeonhardt @mehdirhasan

> Mehdi Hasan ✓ @mehdirhasan
> Writing in @nytopinion today, @DLeonhardt says progressives keep losing because "voters are more attracted to candidates who are likely to win". True, they are. But why always this lazy assumption that 'moderates' are more likely to win? It didn't happen in 2000, 2004 or 2016.

Perhaps. What strikes me is that China and Italy have reacted by closing off regions. (China more successfully than Italy because, well, it's China.) What comparable measures would the US public accept? How does a government justify taking extreme measures to combat a "hoax?"

I'm not sure closing regions matters or makes sense here - we have several hot spots already. We can make lots of reasonable short-term moves: closing schools, allowing work-from-home, offering extended unemployment insurance/sick leave, delaying big events/conferences...

Biden up 19 in a new nat'l poll; at this point having Bernie and the #Bros around only helps him as it makes him seem moderate, shows Dems are coming together for him more than Hillary, and keeps the media paying attention in a way uncontested primaries don't. Wins make momentum.

When it comes to #coronavirus, panic is a mistake. Complacency is also a mistake.

This is quite the thread. Wait for the daily case count... you'll never believe what happens next! (In a way stuff like this makes me hopeful because it shows how lousy the response has been so far: have to believe that all of Europe and the US have now woken up.)

Thanks, Alex. Agreed on all. But we don't even have testing at scale yet. (China and South Korea had it immediately.) Without that, we have no idea how widespread it is, or where, and we can barely begin to respond.

Hey @MarkJHandley - how is South Korea showing exponential growth when they have had exponential decay in new cases the last week? If current trends hold their case counts will double again on the 12th of never. If you're going to present the data, present it all, bad and good.

Mark Handley @MarkJHandley
This version includes South Korea. They were on the same growth curve til 7 days ago - ahead of Italy. The measures they adopted then (subject to the lead time in measurements) seem effective - still exponential growth, but similar doubling period to Japan now.

Another alarm from an MD treating #Coronavirus patients; don't panic, but be prepared. No predictions of millions infected, hospitals collapsing, etc, but honesty on the risks and measures to take. Striking this balance isn't that hard; why can't the media and lawmakers do it?

> you my experience, and information that I know to be true. I won't mention hand washing or sanitizers, or things that everyone obviously knows, as there is plenty of information about this already.

> I have two patients right now with CV, one hospitalized, and one not, and am close to a third patient. Essentially, 14 men went on a ski trip to Northern Italy. All have become ill, and all 14 have tested positive for CV. Of the 14, 4 needed to be hospitalized, and of the 4 patients, 3 are very ill as I write this. One had a significant pre-existing medical condition. The other 3 did not, and are relatively young. The news today out of Northern Italy is not good.

> I have practiced for over 30 years, and have seen it all, or so I thought. Nothing has worried me like this. I recommend to all who read this that you avoid going to large group events such as sporting events, and concerts. I believe that all schools should be closed immediately and classes conducted online, which is relatively simple. I know that so far, children infected with CV have done relatively well, but they might come home and hug Grandpa, who won't do so well. Avoid contact with others as much as possible. CV in the United States is at a relatively early stage, but it won't last there for long. Make sure you have any medications you

Few things amuse/gladden me more than hearing cranky old potheads whine about #Biden (whose position, btw, is to continue to allow state legalization - oh the humanity!) How 'bout that debate, Steve, or have you forgotten?

Airlines are systemically important; this crisis does not result from the result of greed or stupidity among airline shareholders/employees, but a true and unforeseeable act of God (by which I mean Chinese scientists, maybe). Now cruise lines...

I think the Europe ban is indicative that he's been frightened enough to make a decision which is necessary but bad for the economy and markets. This was always heading towards a health vs economy decision and this is first sign he may go with the former.

Must read. Italian physicians are discussing refusing care to older, sicker people, bc of a critical shortage of beds and resources. Make no mistake, this means letting people die. #coronavirus can be controlled, as China/Korea show; but if it is not the consequences are immense.

Hard not to read this and not feel both ashamed and worried - looks like the political and financial pressures destroying the US health care system (surprise ER billing, to take just one example) are coming home to roost at the worst possible time.

The concentration of hypochlorite in household bleach from the bottle is 5-6%. A 1:9 dilution gives 0.5-0.6%.

Coronaviruses (multiple strains) are rapidly and efficiently inactivated by 0.2-0.5% hypochlorite.

• Alcohol also efficiently inactivates multiple strains of coronaviruses. Two alcohols are commonly used:
-- Isopropanol (= isopropyl alcohol = 2-propanol = rubbing alcohol)
-- Ethanol (= ethyl alcohol)

2/ The good news is that the grownup Republicans in Congress (and there are a few) are about to stop taking orders from the White House. Not because they've suddenly become great people, but because they know what's coming in November if they don't.

Something else to worry about. My sense (and I have talked to others) is that the problem is not so much the banks, which have enough cash to survive almost anything, but with hedge funds that have been shorting volatility for a verrry long time...

Btw it's possible that by next week's report - covering this week - the streets will be so empty that crime will be down. In which case expect all the "reformers" to talk about how the courts have adapted and everything now works fine. Pandemic? We don't see no stinking pandemic.

A great question! But @DrugPolicyOrg focuses on evidence-free legalization of psychoactive drugs of abuse; evidence-free FDA approvals for crazily expensive drugs that don't get people high don't matter either way to them. Looks like you're on your own. Maybe try @acamfeuerstein?

My friends are already complaining about the lack of any live "sportathons" (as our 4-year-old calls them). Addiction to @espn: it's real. Show compassion and don't suggest "picking up a book." That's stigmatizing. You wouldn't tell a diabetic he didn't need insulin.

The families know. "He quit his job because he thought people at work were going to kill him... on August 11 2019 he had been smoking a lot of pot. He left the house went and bought a gun..." From a bereaved mother:

> In August of 2019 he had been smoking a lot of pot. He quit his job because he thought people at work were going to kill him and hurt.He was creative and funny. He wrote rap songs and recorded some music with a friend. He was a good son, he looked out for his younger brother , he loved the rescue dog he adopted in February of 2019.
> On August 11, 2019 he had been smoking a lot of pot. He left the house went and bought a gun and then shot himself in the chest in the early morning hours of August 12th, 5 days before his 25th birthday. I know in my heart and mind that marijuana played a part in his death.
> Thank you for writing your book,people need to know that marijuana is not safe.

Forget the "partisan divide," look at the overall numbers: 75% think restaurants are fine, 65% don't want to change travel plans. I've been guardedly optimistic bc I thought people would change their behavior quickly. But national leadership is required and we aren't getting it.

Trump's strengths: (to the extent he has any): brashness, willingness to ignore advice (ie killing Soleimani), a bilious anger that can be useful.
His weaknesses: foresight, empathy, judgment, brains, courage. Hard to imagine a crisis he is less equipped to handle than this one.

A market close is a terrible idea. I remember being at the NYSE on Friday after 9/11 to interview Grasso. The WTC site was barely three blocks away - the shard was visible as we walked through the streets - but everybody wanted trading to resume ASAP - and knew it had to happen.

Only one of those statements is true.

Especially in the US, where consumer spending is incredibly resilient and half the country lives basically with no net. People will spend whatever they have.

Half the country will spend whatever they have. But that half represents a small minority of total spending. And if they get more money now, a bunch of that cash will be used to pay bills, pay down cc/auto debt, etc. It's not new demand.

The reason so many on right are suddenly against "politicizing" this health crisis is they know Trump has done a miserable job and they are trying to defend him. Don't buy it. We elect leaders to lead. Trump has failed and continues to fail. Hold him responsible.

Trump seems notably subdued. I'm not sure if he knows yet that his presidency ended March 11 but he's getting there. The fact he told people to expect problems through July or August is very telling. Someone got through, or maybe just the markets.

San Francisco has closed schools, gyms and restaurants but has kept open marijuana dispensaries.

When this is a RESPIRATORY illness.

The reason for the distinction is that schools and restaurants are not woke; marijuana is very woke.

To be clear: I don't think they should close marijuana dispensaries over this! I think this entire thing is a spectacular overreaction that will do far more damage than the underlying issue. Maybe I'm wrong. . .

Serious question: San Francisco - like other cities with "progressive" prosecutors - has already said it won't be jailing people for misdemeanors bc of coronavirus. Those are actual crimes for which penalties are suspended. SO HOW EXACTLY DOES IT PLAN TO ENFORCE THE QUARANTINE?

Possible, for a while. We will see. Especially if counties are making exceptions for "essential" businesses like cannabis stores. That's gonna be a tough argument (especially since alcohol withdrawal can actually kill).

One very cynical and probably accurate take on the "progressive" prosecutor call to end misdemeanor law enforcement and empty the jails right now is this: crime is likely to plunge in the next few weeks, along with economic and social activity. People are holed up at home...

This is a must read: The real risk now, and it is a real risk, is catastrophic economic panic, as all the people who weren't paying attention two weeks ago (and some who were) overreact to prove how seriously they are taking this.

This doesn't mean we WILL have to decide; it is possible this round of social distancing will somehow work as well as it has in China, and we will be in much better shape by next fall. But we have to start thinking and talking about the potential it won't.

You think people will not die if the economy shrinks 14% y-o-y this spring (per the new JP Morgan estimate)? You think the social and human costs aren't huge? Either we get lucky and come up with a drug that works very soon or we need to be honest about the choice on the table.

When you see headlines like this, remember: they are not untrue, but the spin is major league quality. Hospitalizations are not ICU admissions are not deaths. The denominator matters too; almost 200MM Americans are under 50, under 15 MM over 80.

It is perfectly reasonable to say, it looks right now like we are risking a huge balloon in elderly deaths and enormous stress on the health-care system from efforts to save them, therefore we need to shut everything down.

Alex Berenson @AlexBerenson · 7m
The fact the people who know are NOT making that case and instead claiming the risks are very widely spread (already stretching the data to its limits to do so) suggests they know honesty may cause serious pushback, especially given the economic dislocation we've already seen.

It is perfectly reasonable to say, it looks right now like we are risking a huge balloon in elderly deaths and enormous stress on the health-care system from efforts to save them, therefore we need to shut everything down.

The fact the people who know are NOT making that case and instead claiming the risks are very widely spread (already stretching the data to its limits to do so) suggests they know honesty may cause serious pushback, especially given the economic dislocation we've already seen.

Isn't that true everywhere just because of perspective bias and data challenges? Police see crime and punishment differently than defense attorneys and judges. Spend time reading about Italy right now = mania; focus on China = calmer; focus on India = ?

Back to legalization: I think legalization is a reasonable position (especially combined with state monopoly sales control, which ain't happening); what annoys me is the way it has been sold, the absolute denial of very real risks.

Your annoyance is understood and justified, but I urge you to bring it also to criminalization expansions. Do police/prosecutors pushing for news crimes/longer prison terms/increased funding ever admit the very real risks of wrongful convictions and due process harms?...

How mass incarceration and drug war has been "sold" by many in part explains why there is such energy for reforms that might look risky to those new to this arena. Consider the fact that you think others are being conned now because you have been conned so well for decades.

The early US data (it's in that report) is basically the same; 1/3 of all deaths over 85, 1/2 65-84. We have a pretty unhealthy population so deaths may skew a bit younger, a couple years, but not much. Italy and China now have produced enough data that the risks are very clear.

The risk is we wind up with the worst of all worlds, restrictions severe enough to produce a severe and lasting recession but not end the epidemic. The fact Trump is already talking about July or August is very worrisome.

Addendum - when I say we "should," I mean I think there's a strong case for it - as long as we present it honestly, with real time limitations. I think that might draw buy-in: we will try this for a month, set up our hospitals as best we can and then we are going to move forward.

The reason for not quarantining the medical staff is that it's unnecessary - most doctors/nurses are relatively young and healthy will be asymptomatic or have mild symptoms. If we quarantined house staff for flu, hospitals couldn't run either. The lack of PPE is a problem, tho.

In both Seattle and SF new cases are in decline. In NY, you didn't hear it from me, but many new cases are in the ultra-Orthodox community - the same folks behind last year's regional measles epidemic. At least there's not a vaccine for them not to take this time.

We are now in the phase where public officials race to outdo themselves by proving their seriousness and testing their power, and that is a very, very dangerous place to be.

Hearing that one reason the US may have more cases of severe infection among young people is - wait for it - the prevalence of vaping here. Apparently the correlation in ICUs is very high. Shock, I know.

Just to be clear: the question isn't whether COVID-19 is serious, real, and likely to kill a fair number of older people. The question is whether - having stupidly missed whatever chance we had to contain it - we should panic and shoot our economy in the head by way of response.

1/ So now that we have a fair amount of COVID data it is very much worth trying to think through what this chart really says. Number of reported cases is a function both of the actual epidemic outbreak and testing capacity; the US is rapidly catching up (150000 tests now)...

Nate - do you think it's possible to look at the (negative) rate of change in the percentage of positive tests as testing expands in Seattle etc and make any guesses about the actual number of current infections in a fully-tested US? Or would that just require too many guesses?

> Nate Silver @NateSilver538

Paradoxically, it seems to me we are in a far better place if 500K people (just for example) already have been infected, because that suggests many/most people are asymptomatic or and we have already been through several waves of growth without much health system pressure.

Nate - do you think it's possible to look at the (negative) rate of change in the percentage of positive tests as testing expands in Seattle etc and make any guesses about the actual number of current infections in a fully-tested US? Or would that just require too many guesses?

> Nate Silver @NateSilver538
> We're have no way of measuring the number of cases. This is a chart showing the number of detected cases. Is a rapid increase in detected cases a good thing or bad thing? That's not at all clear.

Paradoxically, it seems to me we are in a far better place if 500K people (just for example) already have been infected, because that suggests many/most people are asymptomatic or and we have already been through several waves of growth without much health system pressure.

Unfortunately true. Some of us were begging for a stronger response by early February. The problem is that the risk of overcorrection is also real and extremely serious.

It might be worth remembering that of the five worst mass death events of the 20th century - WWII/Holocaust; WWI; Soviet/Ukrainian famine; Chinese famine; Spanish Flu - only one was a natural pandemic. History suggests strongly that we are our own greatest threat.

It might also be worth noting that the last big "hard" totalitarian regime (China is not hard totalitarian, it allows citizen travel etc) collapsed a full 30 years ago. I wonder if herd immunity to fascism also declines over time.

Cannot emphasize this enough: if you have kids, let them play outside with other kids. Quarantine then from older adults if you like. But they are at effectively no risk, and you do not want your children to be terrified of other people or waiting to die or for the world to end.

Brandon - the data suggest that the risk of death in kids is so low as to be -- unquantifiable. Obviously people must make the decisions best for their own families, but this is likely to go on for a while, and the mental health issues here are very real.

Again, no disagreement. As someone with three young kids we're coping with this right now. But if they're still able to spread the virus... to adults, the elderly, immunocompromised, etc., that's where the danger lies. Again, I'm no scientist and am open to new data.

Thank you. Tensions are high for everyone, and the health and safety of kids is obviously a flash point - I didn't want to inflame, just to remind folks that mental health matters too.

FYI I started because of your thoughts on legalizing marijuana.

The way it was explained to me is: that would lead to too many people needed hospital care, even if only 10% need it, as this keep growing exponentially.

One key questions - maybe THE question - is how many people get infected, are asymptomatic, and recover. More is obv better. Chinese data suggests that figure could be as high as 86%. Lots of folks already infected but not ill here would suggest the same.

The gap between corporates and treasuries like the ten year is 175 bp that is short of the 300 bp gap in the financial crisis so the gap will continue to widen. This is very bad news for bonds

Your "expert" is naive to think that mutual funds have not already blown out of many of these stocks. Likewise, it is naive to think that hedge funds that employed leverage were not forced to de-lever in the midst of this sell-off. This is what prime brokers do.

It's been difficult to convince people that it's not the end of the world.
They just don't believe in real numbers.
I think people watch too many catastrophic films.

The earlier and more aggressively you test, the higher the percentage of positive tests in asymptomatic individuals. But the vast majority of those individuals will subsequently start showing symptoms.

This also appears to be much less true than initially thought. The average time between infection and symptoms in people is only five days - the early estimates were much longer. This idea that people have it for weeks and then suddenly get sick has become part of the mythology.

A good question and I don't know if Italy has released the data. Normally ~2000 Italians die on an average day, so the recent numbers are large, but the coding issue is real; and the stress of moving elderly, sick folks to overcrowded hospitals may actually be worsening outcomes.

> This is very interesting. Have the death rates in Italy per day remained roughly the same as they would be without covid then? Meaning, if on average 5000 Italians die per day anyways, is that number way up because of covid or about the same in spite of covid?

Fair question. Obv much of the growth is real. But the response matters too. Some very ill patients who would otherwise die in their beds may receive ICU care; some relatively well people who would otherwise avoid ERs may come in with flu/CV symptoms (NY is clearly seeing this).

Again, this forecast doesn't come from me. James Bullard is highly respected. I hope - I truly hope - he is saying this to alert people to the risks we are running. But this isn't just a firebell in the night. It's a fireball.

For other people named James Bullard, see James Bullard.

James Brian Bullard is the chief executive officer and 12th president of the Federal Reserve Bank of St. Louis, positions he has held since 2008. He is currently serving a term that began on March 1, 2016.[1] In 2014, he was named the 7th most influen-

I was wrong - per this, there are only 2,500 hospitalized patients nationally (which suggests the US number is low or the NYS high, but okay). Within days, there will be zero prospect of an N95 shortage anywhere.

We have gone from complacency to panic to somewhere past panic more quickly than I could have imagined. A legal scholar who knows the history of WWII and the Civil War needs to offer some perspective here - I feel like we're approaching those already.

Let me make this as simple as possible: if this forecast is correct, far, far more people will die from the economic crisis this spring than the virus.

> Eric Martin @EMPosts
> Federal Reserve Bank of St. Louis President James Bullard predicted the U.S. unemployment rate may hit 30% in the second quarter because of shutdowns to combat the coronavirus, with an unprecedented 50% drop in gross domestic product.

35 million new N95 respirators a month. 1.1 million a day. Right now there are 2,000 COVID patients in NY state hospitals - out of 15,000 positive tests. NYS accounts for 1/2 of all US positive tests, so presumably there are no more than 5,000 COVID hospitalizations nationally.

> 3M ✓ @3M
> In the U.S., we are producing 35 million respirators per month. More than 500,000 respirators are on the way to two of the more critically impacted areas, New York and Seattle, with arrivals expected starting tomorrow. Read full statement here:

With the St Louis Fed prediction, tomorrow will be down full limit. As in 20%, close for day. Probably even if the stimulus passes, 100% if it doesn't. Nobody can buy into the prospect of a 50% GDP collapse.

I mean, I guess to make the math work you have to assume some decline in gov't spending, because there will also be some private healthcare spending (pharma, mostly) - although all non-essential medical/physician procedures will stop too.

Dr. Gottlieb - hate to say this but it's actually worse than that: in the last four days there have been 20000 positive tests, 103000 negatives, for a 17% positive rate. Looks like the SK rate is about 3%, Australia 2%, Germany mid single digits.

> Scott Gottlieb, MD @ScottGottliebMD
> The 10% positivity rate of current testing is a very high number and puts us significantly higher than the U.K., South Korea, and China. Until we see the positivity rate decline significantly we are still not screening enough.

A shocking forecast, to be sure. But I have been spending a lot of time with FDR (thanks to a book project) and it helps to consider the outcome of the Great Depression. Bad as it was, it didn't wipe out capitalism in the US, though the risk was certainly there.

First, you can't yet know the virus's ultimate toll. Second, you see the speed of the decline as worse than the early 1930s. FDR might disagree. By the time he was sworn in, the national agony had lasted for nearly three years - and it's harder to fix a rusting machine.

For context: oil bottomed around $11 a share in 1986; the last time it was below $10 was 1974. This is a market pricing in worldwide economic depression (I almost said collapse, but let's not go there).

Stock futures are closed down limit (5%) but oil still trades, down 7% tonight. Oil traders are talking about the possibility that oil prices will be negative - that producers will have to pay refiners/storage facilities to hold oil.

The Internal Contradictions of Segregating the Elderly

by Alex Tabarrok March 22, 2020 at 7:29 am in

Current Affairs, Economics, Law, Medicine

There are two problems, even internal contradictions, with segregating the elderly and letting others return to work. The first is fairly well known. When you run the numbers, as the British did, you find that a lot of young people would die. If we return to work too quickly it could easily happen that 20-40% of the US population gets COVID-19. Suppose 20% of the population gets it–that's 66 million people. And let's suppose the death rate is on the low end because healthy, young people get it rather than the elderly, say half of one percent, .005, then we have 330,000 deaths of

I guess the people calling for open-ended quarantines - if they have thought about it all - assume the federal government will borrow enough to make up for the lost activity. But they're wrong. This would mean $5 trillion-plus in new debt. In a matter of months.

- Morgan Stanley economists predict deeper U.S. recession
- Economists see unemployment averaging 12.8% in second quarter

For China, most see the worst hit in the first quarter. JPMorgan Chase have flagged a 40% plunge in Chinese gross domestic product in the first quarter from the previous three months, the biggest contractions in at least 50 years.

Chinese officials, including Premier Li Keqiang, have pointed to claims the outbreak has been controlled and signs of a resumption of activity as reasons for optimism with regards to China's outlook.

"Economic indicators will likely show significant improvement in the second quarter and the Chinese economy will return to its potential output level rather swiftly," People's Bank of China Deputy

Of course, if Americans are to be stampeded into those changes, they will have to see #COVID19 not as a health-system crisis that may kill between 1 in 150 (very unlikely, but theoretically possible) and 1 in 50,000 people by 2022 - but as an existential threat. And here we are.

This is also extremely telling, and I appreciate Professor Gonsalves saying it out loud; it is now clear that many people in the academic public health community see #COVID19 as a chance to mandate economic and societal changes that Americans would otherwise reject.

Oh boy. The correlations between prevalence of cannabis use, speed of regional/national spread, and death rates in Europe/US are now striking. This time correlation is probably not causation (esp. w/so many deaths in elderly nonusers), but it is hypothesis-generating at least.

One fascinating point: how regionally confined the epidemic remains in Italy. Something similar looks to be happening in the US (1/2 of cases in NYS); I wonder if, when all this is over, we will find iatrogenic transmission plays a huge role in spread.

Maybe instead of "cases" it's time to start saying "positive tests," which is more accurate and less frightening. Many of these people are and will remain asymptomatic, and about 90% are not hospitalized. (Or is frightening people the point?)

By now, given the Italian data, for news outlets not to regularly discuss the real case mix is irresponsible. And focusing on the few cases of severe illness in younger people is actively misleading (unless the US case mix is somehow completely different than Italy's).

As I suspect @ezraklein knows, there is no scenario in which "millions" of Americans die in the next few months from coronavirus (unless we deliberately try to infect everyone over 70); these are scare tactics. Mass death is not on the table, but 30% unemployment actually is.

> Ezra Klein @ezraklein
> It is a horrifying absence of political imagination to prefer letting millions die to, say, trying an appropriately sized basic income and mobilizing the economy to surge health resources for 3-6 damn months.

I've seen a lot of different numbers for the mortality rate, but 2% seems to be a conservative all-ages estimate. It was running pretty steadily at 1:40 early on. Isn't the US population over 300M? What's 2% of 300M?

In Germany, you can only go to work and shop, and when there are more than 50 people in a store, you have to wait, 5ft apart.
That's far more than what is happening in most of the U.S.

I also think the Germans must have a generic advantage that we don't know about yet.

Because "public health" isn't a medical job— it is a political one. Fauci etc. aren't the eternally wise, selfless truth-seeking angels many present them to be. They are politicians too, and while their advice might be great— it also might be self-serving.

Maybe I'm wrong or too optimistic, but I feel in the last 24 hours the dynamic around quarantines has shifted notably. The absurd idea of shutting down for 18 months is gone, and the question has become how quickly we can lift any orders.

The driving analogy is telling: Where my wife and I live, we drive a lot: 50K miles a year. Turns out driving is the riskiest thing most civilians do. We were T-boned last year, have seen fatal crashes. But we drive. Risk is part of life. Of course many NYC journos rarely drive.

Very interesting from @SpeakerPelosi: 1) She frames the issue honestly - not everyone is at risk; 2) Sounds like she isn't asking for a quarantine, but "scientific intervention"'- which we can all agree is necessary and would be the best outcome!

Given the aggressiveness of NY's testing, the high rate of positive results, and the relative youth of infected people here, I suspect the demographics of the infection will be obvious quickly in NY. In other words: a lot of people will have positive results and mild/no symptoms.

Look, feel free to tell me I'm not an epidemiologist, I'm a fool, I have the causality backwards. But the pattern even extends to the Diamond Princess. As far as we know, no other cruise ship had nearly as many cases. Which suggests the epidemic there began post-quarantine.

This would also explain the huge and lasting regional disparities in Italy and China; quarantines protect areas with low transmission but perversely worsen outbreaks in the hardest-hit regions.

Further, it explains why countries that have NOT quarantined - Japan, SK, Germany - have had much better results than those that have.

The only way to quarantine is to do what the Chinese did and pull people who may be infected out of their homes. Otherwise what will be a rolling epidemic accelerates.

To be clear: of course quarantines will work eventually. Mathematically, physically, biologically, they have to. But this virus is transmited mostly through family clusters. So along the way they pull the epidemic forward. They do the opposite of flattening the curve.

What is also striking - and odd in the context of what has happened in Italy and NY - is that transmission rates in Wuhan declined immediately when the public panic began (approx. 1/21) and BEFORE the government began the centralized quarantine measures (2/2).

What is also striking - and odd in the context of what has happened in Italy and NY - is that transmission rates in Wuhan declined immediately when the public panic began (approx. 1/21) and BEFORE the government began the centralized quarantine measures (2/2).

The central quarantine ended the epidemic in February, reducing the replication rate below 1, but the earlier slowdown bought time. @XihongLin - if you happen to see this - do you have a sense of why the rate fell so much faster in Wuhan than the US or Italy in that first phase?

US and Italy use soft mitigation (Social distancing). A stronger strategy with traffic ban helped reduce R from 3.88 to 1.25 in Wuhan. an recent italy study showed similar R after their soft home quarantine . To stop the outbreak, more aggressive measures are needed it's not that odd, it's when shutdown started (like what we're doing now), which helped, but before hardcore centralized quarantine

Two @Stanford MDs say the overall #COVID death rate (including seniors) might be as low as 1 in 10,000 - 1/10 the flu. TBH this seems low, since Italy has already had 1 in 10,000 people die, but it shows how much the mortality estimates may be overstated. wsj.com/amp/articles/i ...

On one hand - for @NYGovCuomo to tell @realDonaldTrump to "pick" 26,000 people to die is profoundly irresponsible - it can only add to the panic. On the other, for Trump to mock Cuomo over ventilators is juvenile and bizarre. We need better from both.

I couldn't disagree more on this point. In a democratic and open society, everyone is entitled to an opinion on costs and benefits. And scientists need to be able to debate competing theories openly. Confirmation bias is powerful and dangerous and must be fought.

> Fabius Maximus (Ed.) @FabiusMaximus01
> These out-of-consensus theories are commonplace in every emergency, esp. epidemics. In the public debate, they create dissension and confusion, reducing our ability to cope. A heavy price for us to pay for their 15 minutes.

A [illegible] paper speculating ~1/2 the UK and Italy have already been exposed to [illegible] (which would be good - it would mean the epidemic is close to burning out) is getting attention. Most researchers don't agree, tho. A reasonable and skeptical take.

Like everybody else I'd like to believe this theory, but to me the biggest problem with it is that it doesn't explain the regional disparities - if 1/2 of Italy is already infected, why are deaths so concentrated? It would be nice, though.

Michigan seems to have an oddly high positive test rate. Something like 40%-50%, last I saw. Nowhere near the overall scale of NY, but at the same time not a trivial number of overall positive cases (#5 in the nation).

Not being argumentative. But it takes a while for the cumulative numbers to catch up with current practice. Also, NYC and NY State are in different predicaments at the moment. Some NYC hospitals are testing, but it is evolving rapidly (from lots and lots of drs, nurses, others)

Question: according to @NYGovCuomo, NY #COVID hospitalizations doubled from Friday to Sunday (2 days). But as of yesterday (Tuesday), the doubling rate was 4.7 days. Tuesday is only 2 days after Sunday; Does this not imply hospitalizations actually fell from Sunday to Tuesday?

The math here is pretty straightforward - had admissions stayed flat on Monday and Tuesday (after doubling the two previous days, even that would have been a huge decline), the doubling time should have risen 1 day each day. Instead it rose more than 1 day.

Did he release actual numbers of new admits? Did I miss those? Total hospitalizations is not a reliable guide to admits because those will change with discharges.

A @UniofOxford paper speculating ~1/2 the UK and Italy have already been exposed to #COVID (which would be good - it would mean the epidemic is close to burning out) is getting attention. Most researchers don't agree, tho. A reasonable and skeptical take.

Like everybody else I'd like to believe this theory, but to me the biggest problem with it is that it doesn't explain the regional disparities - if 1/2 of Italy is already infected, why are deaths so concentrated? It would be nice, though.

That's clearly wrong, by the state's own data - fewer than 1/4 of ppl with + tests are hospitalized, fewer than 1/6 of those in ICUs. And I know for a fact hospitals are testing asymptomatic staff and inpatients if they fear exposure (I have a source).

2/ The number comes from a March 19 SCCM paper:

"[One estimate is that 1/2 of] ICU admissions (960,000) would require ventilatory support. Such projections are gross estimates."

More importantly: this is everyone who may need ventilation OVER THE COURSE OF THE EPIDEMIC...

3/ In fact, the paper states explicitly "that U.S. hospitals could absorb a maximum of 26,000 to 56,000 additional ventilators at the peak of a national pandemic, as safe use of ventilators requires trained personnel."

Added bonus: the paper reports the US already has far more critical care beds per-capita than other nations: 35 per 100,000, compared to 12 in Italy, 7 in the UK...

6/ Final point: the paper concludes the real bottleneck is in trained staff and "priority should focus not only on increasing [ventilators]... but on growing the number of trained professionals."

But I guess bashing the WH for not nationalizing ventilator production is more fun.

So... A) The data show zero risk to kids, ~zero risk to teens. B) Many kids - in FL and everywhere - rely on schools for meals, and for a significant number of kids (5-15%), schools provide the only functioning adults in their lives. Tell me again about being too late?

That's clearly wrong, by the state's own data - fewer than 1/4 of ppl with + tests are hospitalized, fewer than 1/6 of those in ICUs. And I know for a fact hospitals are testing asymptomatic staff and inpatients if they fear exposure (I have a source).

1/ I'll just say it, since no one else will: you're not "rationing" if you are intubating patients you normally wouldn't "to protect staff." I don't know what to call that, but rationing isn't the word. Also, the hospital didn't "begin rationing today," per a later tweet...

Dr. Gottlieb - hate to say this but it's actually worse than that: in the last four days there have been 20000 positive tests, 103000 negatives, for a 17% positive rate. Looks like the SK rate is about 3%, Australia 2%, Germany mid single digits.

> Scott Gottlieb, MD @ScottGottliebMD
> The 10% positivity rate of current testing is a very high number and puts us significantly higher than the U.K., South Korea, and China. Until we see the positivity rate decline significantly we are still not screening enough.

Test volume should increase sharply. But the reality is it takes labs time to get set up, and experts have told me there's no way to speed the process up.

Without a time machine, we're stuck.

And turnaround times in our system are...not good.

3/ Essentially, what has happened is that estimates of the viruses transmissibility have increased - which implies that many more people have already gotten it than we realize - which in turn implies it is less dangerous.

5/ One last point here: Ferguson gives the lockdown credit, which is interesting - the UK only began ita lockdown 2 days ago, and the theory is that lockdowns take 2 weeks or more to work.

One of the things Asian countries do is wear masks. They started mass producing masks many weeks ago.

Yet western countries tell their citizens that masks don't work.

Others have pointed this out today too, but it's worth noting that as of March 19 the U.K. government quietly DOWNGRADED the #COVID threat, finding that because of its low mortality it was not considered to be a "high consequence infectious disease."

AT&T 4:42 PM 51%

Status of COVID-19

As of 19 March 2020, COVID-19 is no longer considered to be a high consequence infectious diseases (HCID) in the UK.

The 4 nations public health HCID group made an interim recommendation in January 2020 to classify COVID-19 as an HCID. This was based on consideration of the UK HCID criteria about the virus and the disease with information available during the early stages of the outbreak. Now that more is known about COVID-19, the public health bodies in the UK have reviewed the most up to date information about COVID-19 against the UK HCID criteria. They have determined that several features have now changed; in particular, more

As far as I can tell it came out of his testimony to a U.K. parliamentary select committee- as for what led him to that conclusion, whether it's his own work or a specific other paper, probably best to ask him.

The new assumption is that the virus has already spread much more widely and is paradoxically less dangerous, so cases will peak in a couple of weeks and then go away. Nobody wants to say so but that makes the lockdown basically irrelevant either way.

If the lockdown meant anything - if huge numbers of people weren't already infected - it would delay the peak, not be basically coincident with it.

There was no walkback in the first place. The original study said 500,000 deaths if nothing was done and about 20,000 if social distancing measures were put in place. Social distancing measures were put in place.

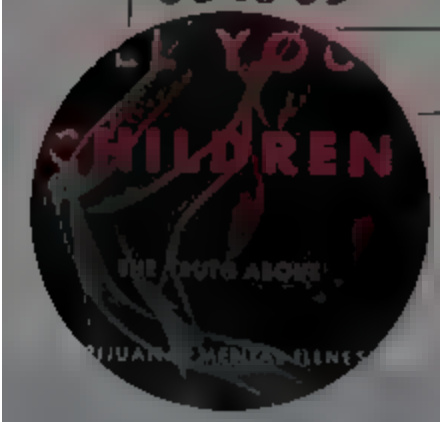
2/ He now says both that the U.K. should have enough ICU beds and that the coronavirus will probably kill under 20,000 people in the U.K. - more than 1/2 of whom would have died by the end of the year in any case bc they were so old and sick.

Alex Berenson @AlexBerenson · 13 ч

3/ Essentially, what has happened is that estimates of the viruses transmissibility have increased - which implies that many more people have already gotten it than we realize - which in turn implies it is less dangerous.



Alex Berenson @AlexBerenson · 13 ч

4/ Ferguson now predicts that the epidemic in the U.K. will peak and subside within “two to three weeks” - last week’s paper said 18+ months of quarantine would be necessary.

2/ In fact, the report says explicitly that "the initial duration of measures... will be several months."

16 March 2020 — Imperial College COVID-19 Response Team

...therefore population-wide social distancing combined with home isolation of cases and school and university closure.

To avoid a rebound in transmission, these policies will need to be maintained until large stocks of vaccine are available to immunise the population – which could be 18 months or more. Adaptive hospital surveillance-based triggers for switching on and off population-wide social distancing and school closure offer greater robustness to uncertainty than fixed duration interventions and can be adapted for regional use (e.g. at the state level in the US). Given local epidemics are not perfectly synchronised, local policies are also more efficient and can achieve comparable levels of suppression to national policies while being in force for a slightly smaller proportion of the time. However, we estimate that for a national GB policy, social distancing would need to be in force for at least 2/3 of the time (for R_0=2.4, see Table 4) until a vaccine was available.

However, there are very large uncertainties around the transmission of this virus, the likely effectiveness of different policies and the extent to which the population spontaneously adopts risk reducing behaviours. This means it is difficult to be definitive about the likely initial duration of measures which will be required, except that it will be several months. Future decisions on when and for how long to relax policies will need to be informed by ongoing surveillance.

The measures used to achieve suppression might also evolve over time. As case numbers fall, it becomes more feasible to adopt intensive testing, contact tracing and quarantine measures akin to the strategies being employed in South Korea today. Technologies – such as mobile phone apps that

That should *weeks not *years

> So we think the government's measures now will, with a reasonable level of confidence, will tip the curve over, will take the epidemic from a growing epidemic into a declining epidemic. Whether we get resurgence of transmission depends really on policy decisions made probably in three or four weeks time. The effectiveness of measures we put in place to replace the current regime comes back to the issue of can we [unclear] lockdown, which almost certainly isn't sustainable for the rest of the year. To something perhaps making or better use of intensive testing and contact tracing. I mean, I can't give you an answer to your question. Is there, like there will be some resurgence of transmission. The hope is that by deploying more focused policies to suppress those local outbreaks, we can maintain infection levels at low levels in the country as a whole indefinitely. It remains to be seen how we actually achieve this and how practical it proves to be.

Right. 3 or 4 weeks (not years, fascinating slip), then back to targeted containment - not mitigation, certainly not “suppression” - and the U.K. winds up with deaths at the far low end of the earlier prediction. If you can’t see the difference btwn those scenarios, I can’t help.

Not as cut and dry as you're making it seem. Discusses an on/off and localized approach, and "these policies" simply referring to home isolation and university closures. Arguing that he was way off seems premature.

Overall, our results suggest that population-wide social distancing applied to the population as a whole would have the largest impact; and in combination with other interventions – notably home isolation of cases and school and university closure – has the potential to suppress transmission below the threshold of R=1 required to rapidly reduce case incidence. Not quite - y axis shows occupied ICU beds per 100,000 population. Red line represents a surge in bed CAPACITY, so the occupancy rate stays flat as the number of beds increases. Countries are surging ICU bed capacity alongside other mitigation strategies.

Apparently the idea that #COVID19 might kill 1/25th or less as many people as the high-end prediction really angers some folks. One group out there seems to want to this to be as bad as possible; I don't get it.

Thank you!

Thank you for proving once again to the world what a dishonest, morally corrupt, rotten to the core piece of shit you are! Greatly appreciated.

May you full fat fascist drown in your own lung fluid caused by SARS-CoV-2, begging for breath and die the most painful death possible.

Deepest contempt for you disgrace to mankind and utter failure of a human being.

Maybe hold the apocalypse? From @nytimes: in Westchester County, which has 980,000 people, is just north of NYC, and was early to the epidemic: 29,000 #COVID tests, 7,200 positives. 73 (!) people hospitalized, 1%. You read that right..

> Westchester County has adopted an aggressive testing philosophy: More than 29,000 of the county's less than one million residents have been tested, according to the county Department of Health, with 7,187 positive for Covid-19 as of Friday. Statewide, about 138,000 people have been tested.
> In New York City, with a population over eight times the size of Westchester County, just under 58,000 people had been tested as of Friday, according to the state.
> The rate of hospitalization for cases in Westchester was hovering at around 1 percent. Of the more than 6,400 people hospitalized statewide, 73 were in Westchester, according to county health

Was mostly joking, though hoping to encourage you to see that many, esp young black men, have long experienced variations on a kind of police state (eg stop-and-frisk). It's long been defended in name of public safety, and it is readily leveraged and defended in time of crisis.

Btw: the Swedes generally dislike cannabis and have very low levels of vaping and smoking (for nicotine, they prefer a form of snuff called snus) - which may also be helping their outcomes.

well, what i would say, is anyone who had an elderly and sick parent knows that visits to hospitals, while often necessary, can also inflame and prolong a situation because of all the microbes that exist in even the best run hospitals.

Ten-cent masks, reasonable entry restrictions around elderly centers like nursing homes (and non infected hospitalized people) are almost certainly the most important steps we could take here. And serology testing to know the real prevalence.

One forecast I'm sure of: scientists will be trying to sort out the truth about #covid19 - how many died, how it spread, what worked to stop it - for years. And even then people will fight over the facts. Bc somehow this illness has become as politicized as everything else.

This is correct, of course. But even more relevant is the time frame. The graphs in the initial report makes entirely clear how much the projections changed.

That is with 3 months of Isolation. He said bed capacity would be fine now too. Even though with the "faster' spread the peak would arrive earlier than June not allowing for the 3 months of isolation to take full effect. So naturally it would have to be well higher than 60K even.

One forecast I'm sure of: scientists will be trying to sort out the truth about #covid19 - how many died, how it spread, what worked to stop it - for years. And even then people will fight over the facts. Bc somehow this illness has become as politicized as everything else.

Journalism's decline can be marked from the increase in passive voice and unattributed actions. "Many are saying" would get an edit suggestion on Wikipedia, which itself is hardly a bastion of rigorous truth.

What it says it that there is absolutely nothing to suggest that the virus is spreading at all. Number of cases will only start to become dependable when you have more tests available than you need - which isn't the case now and hasn't been since numbers progressed. /1

Well, her tweet also references how so many journalists live in cities so hard hit - she thinks this way because of being in NYC. Yet, there are many cities with far lower infection rates.

1/ I get the anger and fear here, and I like Michelle - we had an honest debate about cannabis in 2018. But "ravaged by a plague"? No one knows what the final death toll will be, but the best evidence we have suggests 0.01-0.1% of the population (see Dr. Fauci's comments today).

No, I think this reaction is genuine. I was out today with my kids to get gas and we ran into friends. I am stunned by the depth of the fear out there. And this is outside NYC, rather than in it, with sirens screaming and the streets empty.

Who says it's just the flu? It's clearly more transmissible than the flu, and probably somewhat more lethal than most strains. Lucky us, it is very different than the Spanish Flu too - that killed tons of kids and young adults, this kills almost none.

'probably somewhat more lethal than most strains' is a significant understatement of the current global understanding + we have vaccines for flu. Politicians and media downplaying the risks have IMHO lead to widespread scepticism & communal transmission, woeful preparation eg UK

Hey @ChrisCuomo - I know accuracy is important to you, so you might want to be aware that one of the factual "corrections" in your interview today is wrong. Richard Epsteun says 85% of deaths occur in people over 70; you link to a @reuters story that says it's about 75%...

> And, if you start looking at the mortality rates in Italy, ninety per cent or eighty-five per cent of the deaths are from people over seventy, which suggested something like this is going on. [The number appears closer to seventy-five per cent.] In the United States, we don't have quite the skew, and we have a little bit better supply on things. I think we have a greater ability to ramp up in terms of things. So my guess is you will see real stresses in the short run in the New York area, but that given the time that's available, I first of all did not think that the runoffs will be as great anywhere

6/ There's no reason to believe those were the real first cases. So by mid-February, transmission was common outside China. Why didn't anyone realize? Partly because it was flu season, partly because the virus is not terribly deadly overall, though it tears up the old and sick.

8/ Those are the gasoline on the fire, leading to sudden increase in transmission. Then what? Panic, and an overwhelming societal response. (In the US, the panic was more media-driven and actually predated a signal citywide outbreak.)

9/ But back to Japan. Many Japanese wear masks, and scientists increasingly agree masks slow the spread of the virus. How much? Nobody knows, exactly. But maybe enough to slow the R enough to let the virus quietly infect a lot of people without getting much attention.

2/ The one unquestioned fact about SARS-2-COV: It spreads fast; Chinese scientists put the replication number in Wuhan in January as high as 3.9, meaning each infected person would infect almost 4 others.

3/ If the infection cycle is six or seven days, that means the number of infected gets big in a hurry. Assume the virus appeared in mid-November in Wuhan, with a seven-day cycle. By Jan. 21, with an R of 3.9, it would have infected hundreds of thousands of people.

I've been saying that since the outset: isolate the elderly and at risk (shelter-in-place, no nursing home visits), and everyone else practice increase personal hygiene. At the same time, chuck a billion or three at ventilator/PPE production.

18/ Meanwhile, the restrictions outside Hubei didn't last as long as is commonly thought – by late February many Chinese factories elsewhere were open and production was climbing. By now life in cities like Beijing and Shanghai is almost normal.

19/ But the virus was already everywhere in China. No way it's gone. But the removal of the lockdowns was a medico-social signal – you are safe, get back to work. And the masks and minor social distancing lowered R enough to keep it from blowing up again in a visible way.

20/ If this is correct, what are the lessons for the US and Europe? Well, the outbreak is now so severe in NYC that the city probably faces a rough couple of weeks and needs to be on lockdown. But everywhere else lockdowns should be reconsidered.

21/ Instead, people should be encouraged to wear masks, and large gatherings – 50 or more, say – should be temporarily banned. That means no restaurants or bars, and masks on planes. But retail outlets and workplaces should be open.

That is an incredible stat - I hadn't thought of it that way. But I think the lockdown narrative is so powerful at this point it will take years of analysis (or someone very senior/respected, a Bill Gates type, raising the issue) even to get the question on the table.

22/ Hospitals and nursing homes should be closed to visitors and have fever checks. Widespread testing makes sense, as long as it is done in ways that won't lead to lots of cross-transmission. Otherwise we go about our lives, wait for summer, and slowly build herd immunity.

22/ I know this isn't going to happen. The public health and political die has been cast. And hell, maybe it's entirely wrong. It's certainly not conventional wisdom. But given the costs of lockdown - both economic and societal - it seems worth considering.

New hospitalizations plunged in NY today, deaths flat. Tough to know what to make of one day's data, especially the body counts - which haven't been this confusing since Khe Sanh in 1968, it's just not clear what's being coded - but by any standard this is not exponential growth.

Would be helpful to know the denominator. How many tests were run. Happy about the hospitalizations number.

Think it's a little early to pronounce an absolute peak there, Captain correlation.

NYC updated totals today: ~3700 new positive tests (cases), 808 new hospitalizations, 182 new deaths. We now have a week of data suggesting an absolute peak in new cases and hospitalizations (this a sharp daily decline in growth). I won't tell if you don't.

Fair point. The variability is striking. One question I would like to see asked is how much of the increase reflects already hospitalized patients being called #COVID-19 patients after a positive test (which may represent a nosocomial infection).

Not anecdotes - the city data are very good (as far as I can tell). They are near real-time and focus on the key measure, new hospitalizations. Deaths are lagging and have coding problems and the number of new positive tests is heavily influenced by testing criteria/availability.

Same applies to climate models and financial markets models. They are directionally useful AT BEST.

Data we are using from abroad is garbage (esp China). Some models incorporate IC point of view, also garbage.

Attention citizens! Your Dept. Of Pandemia wishes to inform you that maybe the new model isn't so great either. Don't blame us; we're doing our best. We'll have another model soon. Think of unemployment as a chance to catch up on your reading. Attention citizens!

1/ Let me walk people through why the hospitalization numbers are so important. You get infected. It takes 5 days on average to show symptoms, 5 to 7 more before you are sick enough to be hospitalized. That's a 10-12 day lag. The lockdowns started in earnest about 10-12 days ago.

If this is true, holy god. So what happened then? Maybe: 1) covid left the box ~11/2-ish with a huge Ro but less lethality. 2) It's been spreading like wildfire since. 3) It peaked in Jan in Wuhan after burning through the population. 4) It's now at/near peak in Italy/Spain/US?

Interestingly, the Chinese suggested an R of almost 4 in Wuhan pre-lockdown - which leads to to some truly exceptional growth. But maybe it's lower, like a baseline of 3, and then these regional events drive it into view, and then the panic leads to a very brief superspike.

And it falls to @nypost to deliver a less-hysterical-than-usual #COVID piece from a major NYC hospital, this time Maimonides in Brooklyn. Unlike most this has actual figures. Normally the hospital has 12 ICU patients. Now, in the face of this modern plague, 260. Oh. Sorry. 26.

drip bags are eerily out of place.

Instead of hanging on metal stands next to the patients' beds, they're all out in the hallway — with extra-long tubing delivering drugs, nourishment and fluids to critically ill coronavirus victims in rooms behind closed doors.

The drastic measure — which allows doctors and nurses to treat people without exposure to their deadly disease — was shown to The Post during an exclusive tour of the hospital as it braces for the expected "apex" of the outbreak in New York later this month.

1/ A reader pointed me to Oregon, which has released clear and detailed data. Here's the statewide update from Monday. Two crucial points: no lockdown measures seem to have had significant effect. New infections have bounced almost randomly since mid-March...

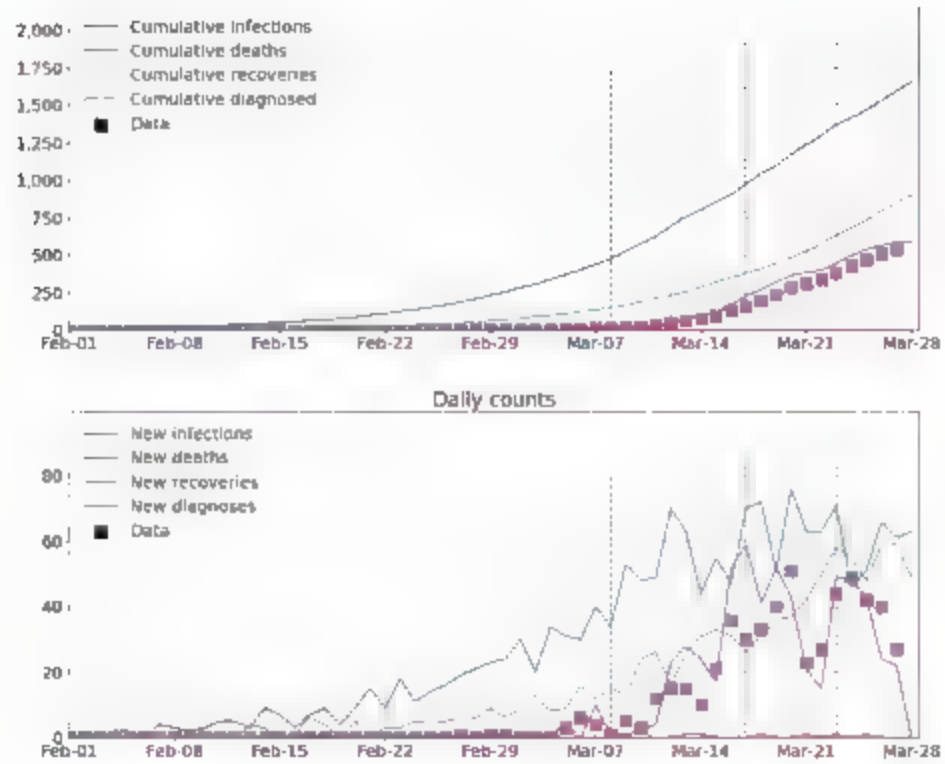

Figure 1: Revised model calibration with the latest case data, showing the timing of different interventions, and approximately 1,750 infections (80% forecast interval: 1,200 to 3,000) by M 28th. Dotted lines correspond to reductions in transmission relative to baseline, from left to rig 10%, 20%, 35%, and 55%. The impacts of these interventions were estimated by calibrating to numbers of positive diagnoses (dots), deaths, and hospitalizations (not shown).

Another reason why hospitalizations are what's most important is that morbidity and attack rate is more important than infections and the infection rate. People walk around with all sorts of viruses within their body, but often time the viral load is too low to elicit sickness.

Update on the @IHME_UW model versus reality in New York STATE: reality is still winning. 56,000 hospitalizations and 11,000 ICU beds projected for April 2; 13,400 hospitalizations and 3,400 beds used. Reminder: this model was released ONE WEEK AGO.

I can never tell what's going to get attention. I wish this would. Let me rephrase: Oregon - a state of 4.2 million people - has shut down in order to, by ITS OWN PROJECTIONS, keep an average of two extra people a day from needing intensive care this month.

Btw: the state doesn't release death projections in this model, probably because they are too small to have much validity, but ICU admits are a multiple of deaths, so this suggests fewer than 20 and probably fewer than 10 extra deaths for lockdown v. normal activity.

Meanwhile a fact accidentally crept into this panicked @nytimes article about LA hospitals: Cedars-Sinai, a huge tertiary care center, had 50 #COVID cases on 3/17 and 115 on 3/31. That's an average increase of, yes, five a day. By the year 2100 it will have 140,000!

Interestingly, the Chinese suggested an R of almost 4 in Wuhan pre-lockdown - which leads to to some truly exceptional growth. But maybe it's lower, like a baseline of 3, and then these regional events drive it into view, and then the panic leads to a very brief superspike.

Point counterpoint in the NYT?

I will take the side of "the virus is real, the economic crash is too, let's solve it with technology."

I won't speak for [redacted] but he could pick his own headline.

Sure. I'd say, Of course the virus is real, but the data around it are so dirty that we don't know what we're counting; the models aren't working; we have panicked and done huge economic harm with little evidence the lockdowns help. Or "The World Isn't Ending. Unless We End It."

Wouldn't it be more meaningful to get a daily % of positives vs.the number of tests administered? If we do 100 tests 1 day and get 10 positives, then do 1000 tests and get 100 positives of course THAT slope is going to be a huge upturn based on real numbers. But as a % it's flat.

1/ As a reporter, I try not to question people's motives. Best not to try to see into anyone's head. But when I write novels, motive is sort of my job. And I'd like to put my novelist hat on for a minute and tell a story. Remember, it's a story – the character is fictional.

FWIW, I asked [redacted]. The model is based on CDC numbers suggesting that there will be 11 hospitalizations for every death. Turns out the ratio is way too high in NYS, and, they say, slightly too low elsewhere. Begs more questions, obv. But they are updating the model.

The unemployment numbers were even worse than the worst forecasts. 10 million people out of work in two weeks (the real number is way higher bc gig/casual workers can't file). @annielowrey must be thrilled.

My bad - I was checking his feed, figuring he would respond there. My feed is such a zoo I I missed it. apologize for missing it. That said, he is sticking with the misleading (at best) answer that "suppression," which the model already accounts for, is the reason.

1/ Fact-checking, a love story: Last week: @NYGovCuomo says the state needs 30,000 more ventilators (for a total of 40,000), has 7,000 in storage.

Other highlights from the governor's briefing:

- As of Tuesday morning, New York State had 25,665 cases, with 210 deaths. The state now accounts for nearly 7 percent of global cases tallied by The New York Times.
- The state has so far procured 7,000 of the 30,000 ventilators it needs, which are in shortage as states compete with one another to buy them.
- New York has tested more than 91,000 people -- by far the most of any state, Mr. Cuomo said.
- New York City had 15,597 confirmed cases and 192 deaths as of Tuesday night,

New York Gov. Andrew Cuomo defended the state's request for 30,000 more ventilators to save coronavirus patients, a day after President Trump downplayed the need.

"All the predictions say you could have an apex needing 140,000 beds and about 40,000 ventilators," Cuomo said at a press briefing Friday at Manhattan's Javits Center. The state's predictions come from Weill Cornell Medicine, the CDC and the consulting firm McKinsey and Company.

Is data being collected / published on survival rate for those who end up on a ventilator? I've heard generally 50%-80% of those put on ventilators do not live? But I think that is old data from China. Is there a better number for death ventilator rate? Thx patient told me.

A realistic, non-hysterical look at the situation in Westchester (north of NYC) from a physician there - not my wife. The ERs are less busy, but the patients who do show up are sicker. Most folks can ride out #COVID at home, but some go south quickly and need hospitalization.

4 Hospital tents were constructed in parking lot next to Westchester County Center in White Plains. It is empty.

White Plains Hospital has dedicated Covid floors -like we used to have AIDS floors overflowing in the 80's- and is busy according to a nurse.

There are a lot of patients who are sick who are home. I have a bunch who are running 101-102 temps for a week or more that I call regularly. There are a bunch that are less ill for a few days.

But, there are still new cases. I had a guy yesterday who I let come in because he didn't report a fever or cough, he had near syncope at home. When he came in, I took one look at him and we put on masks and PPE. He basically had no blood pressure - thought no lung, no cough. First's

4/ Further, what about that prediction of 140,000 hospital beds and 40,000 ICU beds from LAST WEEK? Is that still operative? Because right now NYS is at less than 1/10 that, with no evidence of exponential growth coming.

We've lost 10 million jobs in two weeks. @WSJ reports that economists believe we will lose 10 million more this week and next. Don't worry, public health experts - your jobs are safe!

> Economists surveyed by The Wall Street Journal through Monday forecast employers cut 10,000 workers from payrolls and the unemployment rate for March ticked up to 3.7% from 3.5%. Those benign numbers miss mass layoffs announced by restaurants, retailers, manufacturers and others because they occurred in the second half of March, after the survey period.
> The April jobs report, to be released May 8, would capture the giant spike in unemployment. Some economists project that report could show the economy shed 20 million jobs and the unemployment rate could rise to a record-high level, if existing restrictions remain in place through the April 12 week.

Ironic isn't it that the way healthy people are supposed to stay healthy is staying away from sick people.

But the way sick people are supposed to get better is by hanging out with lots of super sick people (at the hospital).

The worst thing for governors and "experts" basking in the relevance this virus gives them is to have testing that shows most people have already been exposed, in fact given the economic damage people might actually revolt (or at least never listen to an "expert" again)

From a physician at a midsized West Coast hospital:

> As some one considered on the front lines I have been hamstrung from seeing my patients in the office because of what I believe is an overreaction that has to crippled our economy. When I am not in my office to see patients it creates a confirmation of a false cognitive bias and perpetuates that we are "not safe" and so we cower at home even more than we would...Individually I may start to see patients again in my office restricting those at risk or communicating by phone.
> I will tell you my hospital had only one COVID patient who was 87 and passed, however the ER is almost empty and overall our "surge tent" has not seen hardly any one...I know people are afraid but it has been made worse by most of the media promoting fear under the guise of the unknown...we have faced uncertainty before but this time I feel there is something insidious that because of our "tweet and retweet" culture has compounded unnecessary fears.

A realistic, non-hysterical look at the situation in Westchester (north of NYC) from a physician there - not my wife. The ERs are less busy, but the patients who do show up are sicker. Most folks can ride out [illegible] at home, but some go south quickly and need hospitalization.

patient told me.

4 Hospital tents were constructed in parking lot next to Westchester County Center in White Plains. It is empty.

White Plains Hospital has dedicated Covid floors -like we used to have AIDS floors overflowing in the 80's- and is busy according to a nurse.

There are a lot of patients who are sick who are home. I have a bunch who are running 101-102 temps for a week or more that I call regularly. There are a bunch that are less ill for a few days.

But, there are still new cases. I had a guy yesterday who I let come in because he didn't report a fever or cough, he had near syncope at home. When he came in, I took one look at him and we put on masks and PPE. He basically had no blood pressure - [illegible]

BTW, you noted that ER wait times are down. Yes true. I heard from ER docs that volume is down, but acuity is up. Regular people are afraid to go to hospital or medical offices for that matter. So Only real sick people are going to ER

I am the only doctor in my building in White Plains. The other offices all closed and docs are home supposedly doing telemedicine.

I'll keep you posted

This is not complicated. The death toll, as awful as it is, is a LAGGING indicator (and somewhat influenced by coding decisions, though I don't want to overstate that - NY has clearly seen some excess mortality this week). Hospital admits and ER visits are LEADING indicators.

1/ As you sit home watching #COVID death counts spiral, please know the official @CDCgov guidance for coding COVID-related deaths is as follows: any death where the disease "caused or is assumed to have caused or contributed to death." Confirmed lab tests are not required...

NVSS National Vital Statistics System

COVID-19 Alert No. 2
March 24, 2020

New ICD code introduced for COVID-19 deaths
This email is to alert you that a newly-introduced ICD code has been implemented to accurately capture mortality data for Coronavirus Disease 2019 (COVID-19) on death certificates.

Please read carefully and forward this email to the state statistical staff in your office who are involved in the preparation of mortality data, as well as others who may receive questions when the data are released.

What is the new code?
The new ICD code for Coronavirus Disease 2019 (COVID-19) is U07.1, and below is how it will appear in formal tabular list format.

U07.1 COVID-19
Excludes: Coronavirus infection, unspecified site (B34.2)
Severe acute respiratory syndrome [SARS], unspecified (U04.9)

The WHO has provided a second code, U07.2, for clinical or epidemiological diagnosis of COVID-19 where a laboratory confirmation is inconclusive or not available. Because laboratory test results are not typically reported on death certificates in the U.S., NCHS is not planning to implement U07.2 for mortality statistics.

When will it be implemented?
Immediately.

Will COVID-19 be the underlying cause?
The underlying cause depends upon what and where conditions are reported on the death certificate. However, the rules for coding and selection of the underlying cause of death are expected to result in COVID-19 being the underlying cause more often than not.

What happens if certifiers report terms other than the suggested terms?
If a death certificate reports coronavirus without identifying a specific strain or explicitly specifying that it is not COVID-19, NCHS will ask the states to follow up to verify whether or not the coronavirus was COVID-19.

Quick update on the NYC death data, stratified by age. Nothing exceptional here - this is pretty much what the Italians have said - but it's nicely presented. DO NOT LET THE MEDIA FOCUS ON OUTLIER CASES FOOL YOU.

Also worth remembering almost all these people had serious underlying conditions (those without any underlying condition make up about 2% of deaths, and I would be interested to know how many of the under-50s were heavy vapers).

All data in this report are preliminary and subject to change as cases continue to be investigated. These data include cases in NYC residents and foreign residents treated in NYC facilities.

Here's live hospital bed data out of Florida (Florida has great public records laws): 25000 beds available, 2200 ICU beds (don't think that accounts for surge capacity). Hospitals about 60% full. Reminder: Florida just locked down.

The biology: ~5 days infection to symptoms, ~5 to ~8 days symptoms to hospitalization. THAT'S WHY THE MODEL PREDICTED A SURGE NOW, ~1-2 weeks post-lockdown. If there's no surge now, and the lockdowns work to reduce transmissibility at all, how can we have a surge later?

I read headlines that they were 'incentivized' to code for CV19, but didn't read into it. I do understand hospitals are being reimbursed for indigent patients who are treated for CV19, so there's that.

My big question would be sample size and whether the population is representative. Also it's possible the lockdowns reduced transmission of other viruses with a shorter incubation period. But this is basically consistent with hospitalization data.

I think population is representative because Kinsa is using the same network of thermometers to very accurately track seasonal flu across the country.
as for other viruses, the drop cannot be due to them since the baseline (blue strip) was already adjusted to include them.

Also being from NY although the lockdowns weren't official, many people began practicing significant distancing/hygiene well before that. I've been cognizant of this since early in March when new Rochelle broke out.

But, hey, we need to protect her and millions of kids like her from the ~zero risk SARS-2-COV poses to them, so let's just close schools indefinitely. Because the emotional trauma lockdowns pose to children (much less the ⬆️ risk of abuse) is an "inconvenience," apparently.

Daughter is sad/frightened of distance learning

Corona-Content

Our 5 year old had her first online kindergarten"meeting" yesterday. It was her teacher and teachers aid reaching out to the families to test the software, say hi to the kids, and let the grownups figure out any technical issues.

They did a little of their morning routine then went around and said hi and showed a stuffed animal.

My daughter cried the whole time and refused to participate. I talked to her later and she said she was scared to be on camera, wanted her normal school back, and that it made her sad.

She's been amazing the last three weeks, but as a very social child who loves school, I think this was too much of a reminder of what she's missing

The intensity of the propaganda effort to convince us "social distancing" is not just normal but heroic is overwhelming. (And led, of course, by [redacted], which just so happens to be the world's biggest beneficiary of it.) We're all in this together, we are told...

NONE OF THIS IS NORMAL. None of this should be viewed as anything but the ultimate temporary stopgap, to be undone as soon as possible. The burden is on those who would lock us down, not the other way around. Please don't let anyone convince you otherwise.

Updated Oregon report from Friday. There is a longer discussion to be had about what the lockdowns are or are not doing, but the raw data is stunning: overall ER visits and COVID ER visits are plunging statewide. This is the opposite of a surge. The hospitals are emptying.

Btw - if you haven't realized - one reason the public health establishment is so desperate to force every state into lockdown is to avoid the possibility of having a control group; if no free states exist, we can't test their outcomes against those that quarantined.

Alex, a nurse case manager for billing is saying the hospitals are going to label things COVID to get paid. The gov promised to pay and they will ensure payment by labeling this. That's why numbers are increasing as well

Sociologists will have a field day with the fact that hospitals were empty while everyone believed they were full.

Alex Berenson @AlexBerenson
And here's updated Florida data (remember, Florida just went on a relatively loose lockdown, no way it could be having an impact yet): 2000 FEWER patients and 200 FEWER ICU patients than yesterday. You read that right.

A few years from now, everyone will claim they were the lone voice of reason amid the obvious hysteria.

Just like when a candidate wins by 51%, two thirds of voters claim to have voted for him.

1/ This is a remarkable turn from Neil Ferguson, who led the @imperialcollege authors who warned of 500,000 UK deaths - and who has now himself tested positive for #COVID;

627 5.1K 9K

Alex Berenson @AlexBerenson · Mar 26

2/ He now says both that the U.K. should have enough ICU beds and that the coronavirus will probably kill under 20,000 people in the U.K. - more than 1/2 of whom would have died by the end of the year in any case bc they were so old and sick.

111 1.3K 3.8K

Alex Berenson @AlexBerenson · Mar 26

3/ Essentially, what has happened is that estimates of the viruses transmissibility have increased - which implies that many more people have already gotten it than we realize - which in turn implies it is less dangerous.

129 1.2K 4.2K

Alex Berenson @AlexBerenson · Mar 26

4/ Ferguson now predicts that the epidemic in the U.K. will peak and subside within "two to three weeks" - last week's paper said 18+ months of quarantine would be necessary.

139 1.6K 4.1K

Alex Berenson
@AlexBerenson

5/ One last point here: Ferguson gives the lockdown credit, which is interesting - the UK only began ita lockdown 2 days ago, and the theory is that lockdowns take 2 weeks or more to work

The @IHME_UW model vs. reality for New York State, April 4: more of the same, 65,400 beds projected, 15,905 actually used (new hospitalizations fell notably day-over-day); 12,000 ICU beds projected, 4,100 used. Still basically fiction, but at least it's not getting MORE wrong.

Charles: I ask seriously: what peak? The lockdowns (if they work at all) have a lag: ~5 days for infection to symptoms, ~10-13 for hospitalizations, ~20 for deaths. So hospitalizations should have soared in Oregon in late March - that's BEFORE the lockdown could have kicked in.

> Charles Offenbacher @coffenbacher
> Replying to @AlexBerenson
> As an Oregonian, I don't understand your point. Our lockdown has us ahead of the problem and is working, we don't want a surge that overwhelms anything, and we do want empty hospitals now, in advance of a manageable peak (IHME model) in early May.

Now the state is approaching its third week of lockdown - where are these new cases going to come from? If levels remain the same or rise now or in coming weeks the reasonable interpretation is not that the lockdown is working but that IT IS NOT.

Quick question. ICU numbers in NY steady at around 3,500 per day. Each presumably taking up a ventilator. This means that when 300 die in a day then those 300 ventilators are used on the new ICU arrivals (around 300 a day). So where is Cuomo getting the 30k ventilator number?

Ivan Jankovic @giovanelo74 · Apr 3
it's simple - it's called the 10 fold super-symmetric multiplication. Whenever a patient arrives at ICU she multiplies magically into 10 invisible twins who all secretly occupy beds and ventilators unknown to stuff and doctors.

I admit I'm starting to get tired of the shrieking of Team Apocalypse. Say it with me: Deaths are a LAGGING indicator (and we are counting them in the most aggressive possible way). Hospitalizations are what matter going forward, and the model could not be more wrong about those.

I admit I'm starting to get tired of the shrieking of Team Apocalypse. Say it with me: Deaths are a LAGGING indicator (and we are counting them in the most aggressive possible way). Hospitalizations are what matter going forward, and the model could not be more wrong about those.

> Ryan Struyk @ryanstruyk
> In order to be on track for an estimated ~100,000 deaths from coronavirus in the United States, and a peak of ~2,500 deaths per day, the University of Washington model cited by the White House would expect 8,363 total deaths today.

The @IHME_UW model vs reality for New York State, April 5. The model is less accurate than ever. 69K beds projected, 16.5K actually needed; 12,346 ICU beds projected, 4376 needed. Even better (tho not for the model), overall bed count rose less than 600 statewide - less than 4%.

Cuomo when asked today about still needing 110k beds-"The number of beds doesn't really matter anymore. We have the beds. It's the ventilators, and then it's the staff." After going on about NY sharing v's from upstate to downstate, he admitted they haven't moved any yet.

You're just running more tests, will look exponential not Gaussian. The only way to track the trajectory is by the dates of diagnosis (sample taken, so long as it comes back +ve) or symptom onset for +ve. [illegible] produces that data.

BTW: As readers have pointed out, some of the additional capacity appears to be new beds, which means the hospitals are adding beds even though their censuses are falling. Obviously that can't continue much longer - it'll be interesting to see what happens in the next few days.

Charles: I ask seriously: what peak? The lockdowns (if they work at all) have a lag: ~5 days for infection to symptoms, ~10-13 for hospitalizations, ~20 for deaths. So hospitalizations should have soared in Oregon in late March - that's BEFORE the lockdown could have kicked in.

Now the state is approaching its third week of lockdown - where are these new cases going to come from? If levels remain the same or rise now or in coming weeks the reasonable interpretation is not that the lockdown is working but that IT IS NOT.

A comment on lockdowns: Given their impact, they need a clear rationale. We have heard two:

1) To end ALL infections (see Dr. Fauci here, we can "relax social distancing" once we have "no new cases.")

This not a standard we apply to any other disease.

Craaazy theory coming: what if @DrMikeRyan of @WHO admitted lockdowns drive transmission into homes? What if this was his solution:

"We need to go and look in families to find those people who may be sick and remove them."

Nutty, I know. Must be BS.

2/ To avoid swamping the health-care system in the short term, either regionally or nationally. ("Flatten the curve.") In that case, we need:

1/ What is a more reliable metric than hospitalizations? We don't know what we're measuring with tests - whether we are measuring actual spread or the rise in testing. The death counts lag and the @CDCgov has encouraged very loose criteria for attributing deaths to @COVID19.

Rather have a model that is wrong than an assumption that the virus is nothing. Covid-19 is worse than the Flu. In 9 years the highest WEEKLY flu death was about 1700 and Covid is doing that almost daily. What would daily deaths look like if it was left unchecked?

European mortality bulletin week 13, 2020

Pooled estimates from the EuroMOMO network show excess all-cause mortality, overall, for the participating countries; however, this pooled excess mortality is driven by a particularly high excess mortality in some countries, primarily seen in the age group of 65 years and above.

Data from 24 participating countries or regions were included in this week's pooled analysis of all-cause mortality in Europe.

The number of deaths in the recent weeks should be interpreted with caution as adjustments for delayed registrations may be imprecise. Furthermore, results of pooled analyses may vary depending on countries included in the weekly analyses. Pooled analyses are adjusted for variation between the included countries and for differences in the local delay in reporting.

In fact, there's an almost unanswerable argument here about how to code these deaths in people who are really sick - does blaming the coronavirus or the flu (or anything else) for the death of someone who would have died in a few days from a severe underlying illness make sense?

National Vital Statistics System

COVID-19 Alert No. 2
March 24, 2020

New ICD code introduced for COVID-19 deaths
This email is to alert you that a newly-introduced ICD code has been implemented to accurately capture mortality data for Coronavirus Disease 2019 (COVID-19) on death certificates.

Please read carefully and forward this email to the state statistical staff in your office who are involved in the preparation of mortality data, as well as others who may receive questions when the data are released.

What is the new code?
The new ICD code for Coronavirus Disease 2019 (COVID-19) is U07.1, and below is how it will appear in formal tabular list format.

U07.1 COVID-19
Excludes: Coronavirus infection, unspecified site (B34.2)
Severe acute respiratory syndrome [SARS], unspecified (U04.9)

The WHO has provided a second code, U07.2, for clinical or epidemiological diagnosis of COVID-19 where a laboratory confirmation is inconclusive or not available. Because laboratory test results are not typically reported on death certificates in the U.S., NCHS is not planning to implement U07.2 for mortality statistics.

When will it be implemented?
Immediately.

Will COVID-19 be the underlying cause?
The underlying cause depends upon what and where conditions are reported on the death certificate. However, the rules for coding and selection of the underlying cause of death are expected to result in COVID-19 being the underlying cause more often than not.

What happens if certifiers report terms other than the suggested terms?
If a death certificate reports coronavirus without identifying a specific strain or explicitly specifying that it is not COVID-19, NCHS will ask the states to follow up to verify whether or not the coronavirus was COVID-19.

2/ And, btw, other possibly relevant factors, like, oh, COPD, are considered secondary. The rules "are expected to result in COVID-19 being the underlying cause more often than not."

Let's review:

1/ We have very little idea what positive tests mean (we're over 300,000, but they rise more or less linearly with the number we conduct - does that mean the epidemic is spreading or we're just running more tests?)

1/ What is a more reliable metric than hospitalizations? We don't know what we're measuring with tests - whether we are measuring actual spread or the rise in testing. The death counts lag and the [illegible] has encouraged very loose criteria for attributing deaths to [illegible].

3/ The logic works the other way too - people who are really sick WILL be hospitalized. So there may be some "rule-out" cases happening day to day, but those should wash out over time. Thus hospitalizations are the crucial metric. And they are coming in far short of predictions.

SOCIAL DISTANCING

Does your model show the effect of social distancing and other measures?

The model includes the effects of social distancing measures implemented at the "first administrative level" (in the US this generally means the state level) and assumes continued social distancing through the end of the modeled period (August 4, 2020). We classified social distancing measures using the New Zealand Government alert system Level 4 and then assume that locations that have instituted fewer than three of these measures will enact the remaining measures within seven days. We also assume that implementation and adherence to these measures is complete. With each model update, the

News release
13 December 2017

Up to 650 000 deaths annually are associated with respiratory diseases from seasonal influenza, according to new estimates by the United States Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (US-CDC), WHO and global health partners.

This marks an increase on the previous global estimate of 250 000-500 000, which dates from over ten years ago and covered all influenza-related deaths, including cardiovascular disease or diabetes. The new figures of 290 000-650 000 deaths are based on more recent data from a larger, more diverse group of countries, including lower middle-income countries, and exclude deaths from non-respiratory diseases.

"These figures indicate the high burden of influenza and its substantial social and economic cost to the world," said Dr Peter Salama, Executive Director of WHO's Health Emergencies Programme. "They highlight the importance of influenza

This marks an increase on the previous global estimate of 250 000-500 000, which dates from over ten years ago and covered all influenza-related deaths, including cardiovascular disease or diabetes. The new figures of 290 000-650 000 deaths are based on more recent data from a larger, more diverse group of countries, including lower middle-income countries, and exclude deaths from non-respiratory diseases.

"These figures indicate the high burden of influenza and its substantial social and economic cost to the world," said Dr Peter Salama, Executive Director of WHO's Health Emergencies Programme. "They highlight the importance of influenza

And here's California (data from Saturday): 40 MM people, 70K hospital beds, 2,400 confirmed COVID hospitalizations, 3,200 suspected cases; 1,600 in ICUs, total cases roughly flat day over day. Remember: CA locked down early, so this should be the peak (assuming lockdowns help).

None of those deaths have been confirmed anywhere, as far as I can tell. And it would be shocking if deaths of two NY residents weren't national news. (And NY docs I know have not mentioned it. Doesn't mean it isn't true, but the news should have spread very fast.)

In fact, there's an almost unanswerable argument here about how to code these deaths in people who are really sick - does blaming the coronavirus or the flu (or anything else) for the death of someone who would have died in a few days from a severe underlying illness make sense?

Hard to argue any of these points - and even if cases peak and fall more quickly than we were told a few days ago, our failure has already caused unquestionable economic and social damage and caused thousands of deaths.

Also very hard to argue with this. States and WH need to provide clarity for the end of the lockdowns. Will there be one standard? Will states be allowed to go on their own? Will the metric be hospitalizations, new cases, declines in either/both, something else?

It's not just NY, either - people are pointing to many examples where the updated @IMHE_UW model does not match CURRENT public data. They had to know this would be scrutinized, given the fact the last version was so off on hospitalizations - how could they have taken it public?

If they had wanted to blow up whatever credibility their forecasts had left, it's hard to see how they could have done a better job.

Which raises the question: if the models are useless, what do we do now?

3/ And we have seen for the last 3 months that, for whatever reason, regional (or national) disparities don't lessen much once they're in place. If the rest of the US remains at that 1.4x level, deaths ex NY would be about 23,000, and the US total would be a bit under 40,000.

Final note: a quick look at the state level numbers reveals they don't make much sense either (California, with 6x the population of Massachusetts, is projected to have 1/5 as many deaths)... but I will have to look at them tomorrow. Good night all.

Reupping from last night. Long story short, @IHME_UW (the model for which we've shut the country) released its new forecasts late last night. They're ALREADY wrong. Unbelievable but true, see for yourself.

Alex Berenson @AlexBerenson
Here is the newly updated mIHME_UW model with predictions for NY state today (which doesn't need to be predicted, as it's already happened). And here's the actual data from today. As you can see, the NEW model can't even get today right.

Can I point out it's not a "conspiracy theory" to note the people who desperately pushed panic measures now have a stake in making the death toll look high? A conspiracy theory is, "Putin cooked up CV in the Kremlin." This is just an observation of social and political dynamics.

Again, I am NOT minimizing the experience of having #COVID19, but better writers than I am have pointed out that the lived experience of illness and the societal view of illness can at times be nearly impossible to separate; fear is a symptom too.

I think those of us who came of age as HIV spread rapidly in the US understand this deeply - we were told endlessly that anyone and everyone could get HIV (which at the time was always fatal); over time, that warning morphed into the fear that everyone would.

From Minnesota. The median age of the 29 people there who died from #COVID? 86. Including a 69-year-old who had just gone through a double lung transplant.

17 of the 29 lived in long-term care facilities.

Minnesota remains on indefinite lockdown.

Why aren't we talking about WHO is really at risk here? And WHERE they are at risk? Because "social distancing" and lockdowns are an incredibly inefficient way to protect nursing homes and senior centers and hospitals.

Not only that, they probably aren't the best way; the best way would be to have fever checks and masks for staff, strictly prescribed visitor lists, and immediate testing for any resident who became ill.

Observe the slight of hand here - there is no evidence of a "chain" of outbreaks in the US, just one big one in #NYC and a couple smaller ones; why did new "cases" (positive tests) require 18 days to plateau post-lockdown in Spain/Italy if the replication cycle is ~6-7 days?

These @FT charts are right up there with the Worldometers charts (all that terrifying red, no context for how the daily death toll fits in with all-cause mortality) as a fear vector - though the FT charts have a higher R because so many media types read them.

That does not mean there will be no extra deaths - but, Sir David says, there will be "a substantial overlap".

"Many people who die of Covid [the disease caused by coronavirus] would have died anyway within a short period," he says.

Knowing exactly how many is impossible to tell at this stage.

Prof Neil Ferguson, the lead modeller at Imperial College London, has suggested it could be up to thought

We aren't sure how many people who become infected with COVID-19 die, but on March 31 the Oxford Centre for Evidence Based Medicine (CEBM) reduced their best-guess estimate from 0.51% down to 0.1–0.26%.

Among other things, they think some people who have been classified as dying of COVID-19 didn't actually die of the disease but rather of serious existing conditions, and they just happened to have COVID-19 when they died.

0.1–0.26% is lower than most other expert estimates. Frankly it's also lower than my best guess.

An incredible chart: three countries had earlier and more effective "social distancing" than any others: France, Italy, and Spain - the three countries with the WORST epidemics. Wonder why. (Maybe because most transmission is intrafamilial and nosocomial? Just spitballing here.)

Know what 3, 4, and 5 have in common? They were all led by Washington technocrat types (Hoover was an engineer, McNamara ran the World Bank) who insisted their models and theories could outsmart reality, while ignoring what the data was telling them in real time.

The kind of insane reporting that is driving the panic: Arizona didn't reduce its request for ventilators because the stockpile is "dwindling" (remember, California just sent back 500 ventilators!) - it reduced its request because IT WON'T NEED THEM.

GLENDALE, Ariz (AP) — With little hope of getting the 5,000 ventilators it requested from the dwindling national stockpile, Arizona has revised its request down to fewer than the 500 it expects to need soon to treat coronavirus patients, the state's health director said.

Most of the ventilators would be used to equip a Phoenix hospital that shut down last year but is being reopened as an acute care facility, Health Services Department Director Dr. Cara Christ said in an interview. About 50 would be sent to the Navajo Nation, where a severe Haven't seen this anywhere else. Which probably means it's true.

CDC DIRECTOR: CORONAVIRUS DEATH TOLL WILL BE 'MUCH, MUCH, MUCH LOWER' THAN PROJECTED

[illegible] to social distance? Is that the purpose?

DR. REDFIELD: I think different people may look at it in different ways in terms of transparency. CDC had models early on. We didn't really publicize the models. We used them internally to understand deviation strategies. I think part of the importance of getting the American public's attention [illegible] these models did, we really need the American public to be fully engaged and willing to [illegible] and vigilant on the social distancing. As you pointed out, those models that were done, they assume only about 50 percent of the American public would pay attention to the recommendations. In fact, what we're seeing is a large majority of the American public are taking the social distancing recommendations to heart. And I think dramatically, whether it's from the papers we've seen in England or the University of Washington. Thank god some of these numbers are falling short of some of those catastrophic numbers. Tell me about the dynamic of the modeling and how it helps and influences decision making and then, when the reality comes in, how does the decision making transform?

DR. ROBERT REDFIELD: I think it's really important. First, models are only as good as their assumptions. Obviously, there was a lot unknown about this virus. The ability to artfully make a lot of assumptions was much wider than if this was an Influenza B outbreak. Second thing, I will say from a public health perspective, to me, the real value of models is to have a model and then try to understand [illegible] If I invest in intervention strategies here, what does that do to the model?

And here's @nytimes rather pathetically trying to explain away the flattening of NY hospitalizations by claiming that "several" (ubidentified) physicians say standards for admission have risen. Sure. Like if you can't breathe any decent doc is sending you home.

> There are reasons to treat the data with caution.
> The number of hospitalizations, for instance, depends not only on the number of new arrivals but also on hospital admission standards. As hospitals have teetered on the brink of being overwhelmed, they have sent home people whom they would have admitted just a few weeks earlier, several New York doctors said in interviews.

This isn't the flu (as I suspect you fully agree) but the notion that we don't engage in a cost-benefit analysis of life vs economy every winter is fanciful.

No, it clearly appears more dangerous than the flu for very old and medically fragile people - though I'd say there's growing evidence it is LESS dangerous than the flu for young people, for whatever reason - deaths in people under 30 and certainly in kids just aren't there.

The flu season is hitting young people particularly hard. And it's not over December and has stayed high into January, according to state data. Staff at Southern California hospitals say their emergency departments have been flooded since the holidays with patients complaining of fever, headaches, sore throats and other flu symptoms.

Hospitals trying to manage overcrowding have asked patients not to come to the emergency room unless absolutely necessary and instead go to urgent care centers. At Loma Linda Medical Center in San Bernardino, staff erected a massive tent in the parking lot to

Also don't forget - health-care is a massive industry in the US. Nurses, people who work in physician offices, etc - they all see a piece of this and they see firsthand the counts don't seem to rising fast. And they see how #COVID actually progresses (or doesn't) in many people.

I didn't say I agreed with it - I said it was a fair, non-hysterical, DATA-DRIVEN analysis of the risks. Which has been sorely lacking and, yes, it is possible both for the virus to be a real risk and for our response to be a horrendous overreaction.

If our response is a "horrendous overreaction" then the "real risk" is actually . . . what? Pretty low? Just impacts folks we don't care about / were gonna die soon anyway? What? How are you measuring the impact of the risk evidenced here?

I would say “horrendous” has more to do with the costs of the lockdowns - which in a matter of weeks have proven higher than I think even the most pessimistic estimates and which are still unfolding - and the fact we didn’t consider other paths before going this way.

Decent @nytimes piece on the infighting in New York last month. But note this line: "the virus mainly spreads between people in close contact." Exactly. So why are we locking people in their homes? Especially in areas where mass transit is far less common?

1/ Easy way to think about lockdowns and the importance of the models: if we are going to take a step this harmful, we can only do so for one of two reasons:

So @NYGovCuomo has reported ICU patients and discharges for weeks. Not today. Just new hospitalizations - which are now 2/5 what they were a week ago - and deaths (a lagging indicator, as he said). I wonder why. And, oh yeah, a promise NY won't go back to normal anytime soon.

1/ #COVID—19 is devastating hospitals and employees nationally. But not for the reason you think. They are empty - prepared for a surge that has not come - and burning cash. An executive reports his group's stronger hospitals have "months" of cash; the weaker ones have "weeks."

- Amalgamation of this CFO's discussions with about 15 other CFOs
- Seeing decline in volume about 40% and similar revenue cut – his low was about 50% cut in volume but only about 2-5% COVID
- Outpatient basically is a zero
- Only exception is hot spots which have a lot of volume but much lower revenue and higher cost because of PPE
- A reasonable way to think about it is down 40-60% at the peak
- No one expects to recapture everything they lost
- Staff
  - Not flexing yet
  - Post spike in likely have to make some adjustments
  - Could take 40% off of earnings and need to reduce staffing by 10% but not close to enough

Yes. But. In February I was worried about the virus. By mid-March I was more scared about the economy. But now I'm starting to get genuinely nervous. This isn't complicated. The models don't work. The hospitals are empty. WHY ARE WE STILL TALKING ABOUT INDEFINITE LOCKDOWNS?

I'm responding more generally to the implicit assertion that social distancing didn't have any impact prior to the lockdown order. It plainly did.

Eric - here's a nice timeline from Ohio. The truth is aside from school closings March 16, almost nothing happened before the lockdown March 23. Lot of announcements, but very little of importance.

And this is as cases were theoretically rising to a theoretical peak of 62,000 in the "unmitigated" model. This just doesn't comport with reality in any meaningful way.

Alex, so what does account for the Ohio peak coming before mitigation? (Also, Gov DeWine postponed the primary before March 17, which presumably had powerful signaling value.) And what accounts for SF (early lockdown, flat curve) versus NYC (later lockdown, steeper peak)?

The point is that Ohio peak DIDN'T actually come before mitigation - the point is that graph, like the other models, presents a version of not just of the present but of the PAST that is counterfactual - Orwellian in the most basic sense.

In areas where public officials have resisted or delayed stay-at-home orders, people changed their habits far less. Though travel distances in those places have fallen drastically, during the week of March 23 they were still typically more than three times those in areas that had imposed lockdown orders, the analysis shows.

A half-dozen of the most populous counties where residents were traveling widely were in Florida, where Gov. Ron DeSantis resisted calling for a statewide lockdown until April 1.

Here's a thought - maybe the epidemics are driven by complex (and not so complex, like density and mass transit) constellation of factors and the lockdowns are a sideshow at best.

Time to start using more straightforward language and calling out people who don't tell the truth, like @pbump. The original model explicitly accounted for the effect of lockdowns. It was wrong in real-time, embarrassingly so; that's why it's been updated. (It's still wrong.)

Philip Bump @pbump
A notable shift downward in projected deaths from coronavirus is already being spun as "experts were wrong!!" instead of "hey, the thing experts said would drive down deaths might be driving down deaths."

New German data show that 15 percent of people in one region have already been infected with CV (remember - more infections is good news, it means the virus is less dangerous) and the fatality rate is 0.37%.

And speaking of all-cause mortality - the new European numbers are out. A slight but notable increase over the expected counts. Could go higher as more data comes in. It's much smaller than the spike in earlier flu epidemics (see 2016/17) but it's there.

euromomo.eu

European mortality bulletin week 14, 2020

The latest poolest estimates from the EuroMOMO network show a steep increase in excess all-cause mortality overall for the participating European countries, related to the COVID-19 pandemic.

This overall excess mortality is driven by a very substantial excess mortality in some countries, primarily seen in the age group of 65 years and above, but also in the age group of 15-64 years.

Data from 24 participating countries or regions were included in this week's pooled analysis of all-cause mortality in Europe.

The number of deaths in the recent weeks should be interpreted with caubon as adjustments for delayed registrations may be imprecise. Furthermore, results of pooled analyses may vary depending on countries included in the weekly analyses. Pooled analyses are adjusted for variation between the included countries and for differences in the local delay in reporting.

Deleting and CORRECTING previous tweet: the last tweet did not include week 14 numbers - those show a larger spike - still smaller than the worst flu epidemics, but much more comparable.

Nobody says COVID-19 is not real, that it can't tax hospitals or kill people, esp. if they are over 75 or have comorbidities. But right now the best CURRENT projection is for 61,000 US deaths. That was the 2017 flu season. Why have we shut the country?

No. He's a photographer that just got you to give him a shout out/bigger platform than he had. He adds nothing to your work other than being a social media parasite. (And I've seen better photography.)

Washington State shuts down its COVID field hospital. Total patient count: Zero. The move is ""aimed at helping another state with a more significant need..." Good luck with that. kjaw.org/stories/washin ...

Army field hospital for Covid-19 surge leaves Seattle after 9 field hospital deployed to CenturyLink Field Event Center to the U.S. Department of Defense.

The 250-bed facility, for which setup began on March 30, was intended to help Washington state's health care system tend to non Covid-19 patients in the event of a hospital surge.

But just three days after announcing the facility was ready to receive patients, officials say they're returning the hospital to the federal government.

The action is aimed at helping another state with a more significant need for hospital capacity at this time, according to the Governor's Office. The facility did not see any patients during the time it was slated to operate in Seattle.

I think this has a lot of merit - it is the whole point of flattening the curve. But right now the only thing flatter than the curve is the economy.

> A key metric which doesn't get enough attention is rate of growth of hospitalizations which IMO is the real danger of any disease even if 100% treatable. Mortality of acute appendicitis is ~0%...if you get hospital care, tends to 100% if you don't.Thread twitter.com/ludwitt/status… twitter.com/ludwitt/status…

Turns out the Icelandic #COVID data shows almost the exact fatality rate of the new German data: about 1 in 300 - 6 deaths in 1648 positive tests). Somewhat worse than the flu, though other data suggests the flu is much MORE dangerous to the young.

From a reader in Spain, arguably the country most devastated by #Covid_19, and well worth reading in full. He argues that Spain has made an enormous and deadly mistake by wasting its resources on a broad lockdown instead of failing to protect the vulnerable:

Hi there. Sorry if these emails get a bit boring, I assume you're getting a thousand emails an hour now so it must hard to respond!

One theory that has been floated to explain the ineffectiveness of Spain's and Italy's lockdowns is that most transmission of the virus is nosocomial. In a recent tweet you added nursing homes as a possible reason for the ongoing carnage. So, regarding that... https://elpais.com/espana/madrid/2020-04-08/4750-ancianos-mueren-en-las-residencias-de-madrid-en-el-ultimo-mes.html

About 8% of Madrid's nursing home population has died in a month! And yes, the article distinguishes between total deaths (4,750) and those certified or suspected to have been caused by Covid-19 (4,260).Some observations:

Because the media focus on outlier cases obscured the truth that the vast majority of the mortality risk is in the elderly or people with severe comorbidities.

1/ I try to analyze dispassionately. But I will admit I am ANGRY about the way we have largely ignored the massive harm lockdowns and school closings have on kids. Remember: anyone under 30 is at almost ZERO risk here (there are always outliers; planes crash but flying is safe).

2/ Children, more than anyone else, suffer immediately from the lockdowns. They're denied school. They're denied normal socializing with their friends. In many places they have even - bizarrely - been denied the chance to play outside.

3/ The stress even on healthy families is incredible. And for children in troubled families, the cost is far higher; for those kids, schools may well be the only chance they have to be seen every day by an adult who is not high or abusive.

Also, lockdowns have increased domestic violence dramatically but I guess victims will need to suck it up since there are more important issues.

4/ Of all the choices we've made, sacrificing the mental health of children at zero risk from this illness is the LEAST acceptable. But so many in the media are young and don't have children, or perhaps are married couples with one child (an equation that makes care easier).

5/ At the very least, the media needs to STOP presenting a hugely misleading (to be polite - fictional would be more accurate) picture of the mortality risks associated with #COVID so that parents will let their kids play together outside. That would be a tiny step toward sanity.

Very true statement! The children in our community has endured [redacted] and now this lockdown. We have had the most cases of attempted suicides and Baker Acts ever. Not are they falling behind academically but are being torn apart emotionally.

The Speaker of the Michigan House breaks with his state's lockdown. (Have other prominent lawmakers done so? I don't know of examples. In any case, he is one of the first, but he won't be the last.)
